

NINTH EDITION

Family Therapy

AN OVERVIEW

Irene Goldenberg ■ Mark Stanton ■ Herbert Goldenberg

Want to turn C's into A's?

Obviously, right?

But the right way to go about it isn't always so obvious. Go digital to get the grades. MindTap's customizable study tools and eTextbook give you everything you need all in one place.

Engage with your course content, enjoy the flexibility of studying anytime and anywhere, stay connected to assignment due dates and instructor notifications with the MindTap Mobile app...

and most of all...EARN BETTER GRADES.

TO GET STARTED VISIT
WWW.CENGAGE.COM/STUDENTS/MINDTAP

 CENGAGE
Learning®

MindTap®

NINTH EDITION

Family Therapy

AN OVERVIEW

Irene Goldenberg

Professor Emerita, University of California, Los Angeles

Mark Stanton

Azusa Pacific University

Herbert Goldenberg

Australia • Brazil • Mexico • Singapore • United Kingdom • United States

This is an electronic version of the print textbook. Due to electronic rights restrictions, some third party content may be suppressed. Editorial review has deemed that any suppressed content does not materially affect the overall learning experience. The publisher reserves the right to remove content from this title at any time if subsequent rights restrictions require it. For valuable information on pricing, previous editions, changes to current editions, and alternate formats, please visit www.cengage.com/highered to search by ISBN#, author, title, or keyword for materials in your areas of interest.

Important Notice: Media content referenced within the product description or the product text may not be available in the eBook version.

Family Therapy: An Overview, Ninth Edition

Irene Goldenberg, Mark Stanton and Herbert Goldenberg

Product Director: Jon Goodspeed

Product Manager: Julie Martinez

Content Developer: Amelia Blevins

Product Assistant: Stephen Lagos

Marketing Manager: Jennifer Levanduski

Art and Cover Direction, Production Management, and Composition: Lumina Datamatics, Inc.

Manufacturing Planner: Judy Inouye

Cover Image: ©kasyanovart/Shutterstock

Unless otherwise noted, all items

© Cengage Learning

© 2017, 2013 Cengage Learning

WCN: 02-200-203

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED. No part of this work covered by the copyright herein may be reproduced or distributed in any form or by any means, except as permitted by U.S. copyright law, without the prior written permission of the copyright owner.

For product information and technology assistance, contact us at Cengage Learning Customer & Sales Support, 1-800-354-9706

For permission to use material from this text or product, submit all requests online at www.cengage.com/permissions

Further permissions questions can be emailed to permissionrequest@cengage.com

Library of Congress Control Number: 2016930346

Student Edition: ISBN: 978-1-305-09296-9

Loose-leaf Edition: ISBN: 978-1-305-86639-3

Cengage Learning

20 Channel Center Street
Boston, MA 02210
USA

Cengage Learning is a leading provider of customized learning solutions with employees residing in nearly 40 different countries and sales in more than 125 countries around the world. Find your local representative at www.cengage.com.

Cengage Learning products are represented in Canada by Nelson Education, Ltd.

To learn more about Cengage Learning Solutions, visit www.cengage.com.

Purchase any of our products at your local college store or at our preferred online store www.cengagebrain.com.

Dedication to Herb Goldenberg, 1926–2008

To Herb, whose compassion, integrity, intelligence, and unwavering support nourished our relationship and made this book possible. Thank you for the life, the love, and the family.

Irene Goldenberg

Contents

PART I FUNDAMENTALS OF FAMILY PSYCHOLOGY 1

1 Adopting a Family Relationship Framework 1

- Family Systems: Fundamental Concepts 2
- Today's Families: A Pluralistic View 3
- Family Structure 4
 - Basic Structural Characteristics 4
 - Family Interactive Patterns 5
- Family Narratives and Assumptions 5
- Family Resiliency 7
- Gender, Race, and Ethnicity and Family Therapy 10
 - Gender Roles and Gender Ideology 10
- Cultural Diversity and the Family 12
- Impact of Gender and Cultural Influences on the Therapist and Therapy 14
- Shifting Perspectives of Family Therapy 15
 - Shifting Paradigm: From Individual Psyche to Family System 15
 - The Origins of Family Therapy: A New Paradigm Begins to Take Shape 16
- Cybernetics: The Paradigm Shift Continues 19
- Reciprocal Determinism 20
- Second-Order Cybernetics and Postmodernism 22
- The Identified Patient as Seen from the Different Family Therapy Perspectives 25
- Summary 27
- Recommended Readings 28

2 Family Development: Continuity and Change 29

- Developing a Life Cycle Perspective 30
 - Identifying Developmental Tasks 30
 - Conceptualizing the Life Cycle: Some Preliminary Cautions 30
- Family Diversity May Modify Life Cycle Stages 31
- The Family Life Cycle Framework 32
 - Family Life Cycle Stages 32
 - Continuity and Change Throughout the Family Life Cycle 32

A Family Life Cycle Stage Model	35
The Developmental Stages	35
Family Transitions and Symptomatic Behavior	35
Family Life Cycles: A Multidimensional, Multicultural, and Multigenerational Perspective	36
Critiques of the Stage Model	37
The Stages of Family Development	39
“Coupling” and Preparing for Parenthood	40
The Arrival of Children	41
Coping with Adolescence	43
Leaving Home	44
Reorganizing Generational Boundaries	44
Retirement, Illness, Widowhood	44
Other Developmental Sequences in Families	45
Single-Parent–Led Families	47
Remarried Families	49
Families with Gay or Lesbian Members	53
Summary	58
Recommended Readings	59

3 Diversity in Family Functioning 60

Multicultural and Culture-Specific Considerations	62
Culture-Sensitive Therapy	63
Developing a Multicultural Framework	64
Cultural Specificity and Family Systems	65
Gender Issues in Families and Family Therapy	69
Feminism and Family Therapy	71
Feminist Reexamination of Family Therapy Theory and Practice	72
Gender, Work, and Family Life	73
Men’s Studies and Gender-Role Awareness	74
Therapy from a Gender-Sensitive Perspective	79
Socioeconomic Status and Family Functioning	79
Therapy and Social Justice	81
Summary	82
Recommended Readings	83

4 Systems Theory and Systemic Thinking 84

Extending Beyond the Scientific Method	84
Seeing the System	85
Some Characteristics of a Family System	87
Organization and Wholeness	87
Family Rules and Patterns	89

Family Homeostasis or Adaptation?	92
Feedback, Information, and Control	92
Subsystems and Suprasystems	95
Boundaries	96
Open and Closed Systems	97
Families and Larger Systems	99
Family–School Interventions	99
Family–Healthcare Interventions	101
Family Interventions with Other Populations	101
Systemic Thinking in Family Therapy Practice	103
Critiques of Systems Theory	105
Summary	107
Recommended Readings	107

PART II THE DEVELOPMENT AND PRACTICE OF FAMILY THERAPY 108

5 Origins and Growth of Family Therapy 108

Historical Roots of Family Therapy	109
Studies of Schizophrenia and the Family	109
Fromm-Reichmann and the Schizophrenogenic Mother	109
Bateson and the Double Bind	110
Lidz: Marital Schism and Marital Skew	112
Bowen, Wynne, and NIMH Studies	113
Marriage and Premarriage Counseling	116
The Child Guidance Movement	118
Group Dynamics and Group Therapy	119
The Evolution of Family Therapy	121
From Family Research to Family Treatment (1950s)	121
The Rush to Practice (1960s)	123
Innovative Techniques and Self-Examination (1970s)	124
Professionalization, Multiculturalism, and a New Epistemology (1980s)	126
Integration, Eclecticism, and the Impact of Constructionism (1990s)	128
Ecological Context, Multisystemic Intervention, and Evidence-Based Practice (2000s)	131
The Core Competency Movement (2000–present)	132
Summary	134
Recommended Readings	135

6 Professional Issues and Ethical Practices 136

- Professional Issues 136
 - The License to Practice 137
 - Peer Review 138
 - Managed Care and Professional Practice 139
 - Legal Liability 141
- Maintaining Ethical Standards 145
 - Professional Codes of Ethics 145
 - Ethical Issues in Couples and Family Therapy 146
 - Confidentiality 149
 - Informed Consent 152
 - Privileged Communication 153
 - Maintaining Professional Competence 154
- Summary 156
- Recommended Readings 156

PART III THE ESTABLISHED SCHOOLS OF FAMILY THERAPY 157

7 Psychodynamic Models 157

- The Place of Theory 159
- Psychodynamic Models: Some Historical Considerations 160
 - Freud's Impact on Family Therapy 161
 - Adler and Sullivan: Contributing Pioneers 162
- The Psychodynamic Outlook 164
 - Classical Psychoanalytic Theory 164
 - Early Approaches to Integrating Psychodynamic Theory with Family Systems Theory 166
 - Psychoanalysis and Family Dynamics: Ackerman's Foundational Approach 166
- Object Relations Theory 170
- Object Relations Therapy 174
 - Object Relations and Family-of-Origin Therapy (Framo) 174
 - Object Relations Family Therapy (Scharff and Scharff) 176
- Kohut and Self Psychology 180
- Intersubjective Psychoanalysis 183
- Relational Psychoanalysis 184
- Postscript: Attachment Theory and Neuroscience 186
- Summary 187
- Recommended Readings 189

8 Transgenerational Models 190

- Bowen's Family Theory 191
- Eight Interlocking Theoretical Concepts 193
 - According to Family Systems Theory, Eight Forces Shape Family Functioning: 194
 - Differentiation of Self 194
 - Triangles 198
 - Nuclear Family Emotional System 200
 - Family Projection Process 201
 - Emotional Cutoff 202
 - Multigenerational Transmission Process 203
 - Sibling Position 204
 - Societal Regression 205
 - Empirical Support for Bowen's Theories 205
- Bowen Family Systems Therapy 207
 - The Evaluation Interview 207
 - The Genogram 209
 - Therapeutic Goals 211
 - Back Home Visits 214
 - Family Therapist as Coach 214
 - A Controlled, Cerebral Approach 216
 - Contemporary Bowenian Theorists 216
- Contextual Therapy 217
 - Relational Ethics 217
 - Family Ledger, Legacies, Debts, and Entitlements 219
 - Therapeutic Goals 221
 - The Ethical Connection 221
- Summary 223
- Recommended Readings 223

9 Experiential Models 224

- A Shared Philosophical Commitment 225
- The Experiential Model 226
- Carl Whitaker and Symbolic-Experiential Family Therapy 226
 - The Use of Co-Therapy with Schizophrenics 227
 - The Symbolic Aspects of Family Therapy 228
 - The Therapist's Use of Self 229
 - Normalizing Human Behavior 229
 - Establishing Therapeutic Goals 230

The Therapeutic Process	230
Toward Evidence for Symbolic-Experiential Family Therapy	233
Gestalt Family Therapy (Kempler)	235
Leading Figure: Walter Kempler	237
The Therapeutic Encounter	238
The Human Validation Process Model (Satir)	240
Leading Figure: Virginia Satir	240
Symptoms and Family Balance	241
Individual Growth and Development	242
Family Roles and Communication Styles	243
The “Threat and Reward” and “Seed” Models	244
Family Assessment and Intervention	244
Family Reconstruction	246
The Avanta Network	247
Satir’s Legacy	248
Emotionally Focused Therapy	248
Leading Figures: Johnson and Greenberg	249
A Brief, Integrative Approach	249
The Change Process	249
Attachment Theory and Adult Relatedness	250
Effectiveness Evidence for EFT	251
Summary	252
Recommended Readings	253

10 The Structural Model 254

The Structural Outlook	255
Leading Figure: Salvador Minuchin	255
Other Leading Figures in Structural Theory	257
Psychosomatic Families	257
Structural Family Theory	258
Family Structure	259
Family Subsystems	260
Family Dysfunction	261
Boundary Permeability	262
Alignments, Power, and Coalitions	264
Structural Family Therapy	266
Therapeutic Goals	266
Joining and Accommodating	267

Assessing Family Interactions	268
Monitoring Family Dysfunctional Sets	271
Restructuring Transactional Patterns	275
Research on the Effectiveness of Structural Family Therapy	280
Summary	282
Recommended Readings	282

11 Strategic Models 283

The Communications Outlook	284
The Strategic Outlook	284
MRI Interactional Family Therapy	285
Don Jackson	285
Developing a Communication Paradigm	285
Paradoxical Communication	287
Therapeutic Assumptions	288
First-Order and Second-Order Changes	289
The Therapeutic Double Bind	290
MRI Brief Family Therapy	292
Three Types of Misguided Solutions	292
MRI Brief Therapy in Action	292
Strategic Family Therapy (Haley and Madanes)	294
Jay Haley, John Weakland, Milton Erickson	296
The Meaning of Symptoms	297
Triangles, Sequences, and Hierarchies	298
Developing Therapeutic Strategies	299
The Initial Interview	300
The Use of Directives	301
The Milan Systemic Model	305
History and Leaders	305
Key Concepts: Paradoxes, Counterparadoxes, Positive Connotations, and Rituals	306
Structured Family Sessions	307
An Evolving Model: Hypothesizing, Neutrality, and Circular Questioning	307
A Post-Milan Systemic Epistemology	308
Reflexive Questioning	309
Effectiveness of Strategic Approaches	311
Summary	312
Recommended Readings	313

12 Behavioral and Cognitive-Behavioral Models 314

- Behavioral Therapy and Family Systems 315
 - Leading Figures 315
 - Adopting a Family Framework 315
- The Rise of Cognitive-Behavioral Therapy With Families 316
 - Leading Figures: Ellis and Beck Applied to Families 317
 - The Cognitive-Behavioral Outlook 318
- The Key Role of Assessment 318
 - A Behavioral Assessment 318
 - A Cognitive-Behavioral Assessment 319
- Behaviorally Influenced Forms of Family Therapy 320
 - Behavioral Couples Therapy 321
 - Broadening the Outlook: The Cognitive Perspective 324
 - Integrative Couples Therapy 325
 - The Gottman Method 327
 - Behavioral Parent Training and Family Management Skills 329
 - Contingency Contracts and Other Techniques 331
 - Research in Behavioral Couple and Family Therapy 334
- Functional Family Therapy 335
- Conjoint Sex Therapy 338
- A Constructivist Link 342
- Summary 343
- Recommended Readings 344

PART IV NEW DIRECTIONS IN FAMILY THERAPY 345

13 SOCIAL CONSTRUCTION MODELS I: SOLUTION-FOCUSED THERAPY AND COLLABORATIVE THERAPY 345

- The Postmodern Revolution 346
- Postmodernist Constructions 347
- Postmodern Therapeutic Outlooks 349
- Social Constructionist Therapies 351
 - Solution-Focused Brief Therapy (SFBT) 351
 - Solution-Oriented Possibility Therapy 360
 - A Collaborative Approach 362
 - The Reflecting Team 366
- Summary 368
- Recommended Readings 369

14 Social Construction Models II: Narrative Therapy 370

- Poststructuralism and Deconstruction 372
 - Thin and Thick Descriptions 373
 - Deconstruction 374
 - Leading Figures: Michael White, David Epston, and Colleagues 375
- Self-Narratives and Cultural Narratives 375
- A Therapeutic Philosophy 377
- Therapeutic Conversations 378
 - Externalizing the Problem 378
 - Employing Therapeutic Questions 380
 - Seeking Unique Outcomes 381
 - Co-Constructing Alternative Stories 382
- Therapeutic Ceremonies, Letters, and Leagues 383
 - Definitional Ceremonies 383
 - Therapeutic Letters 384
 - Forming Supportive Leagues 386
- Summary 388
- Recommended Readings 389

15 Population-Based Family Treatments 390

- Families and Schools 391
- Families and Mental Disorders 391
 - Families With Depression and Anxiety 391
 - Families and Substance Abuse 392
 - Families and Eating Disorders 393
 - Families and Serious Mental Illness 394
 - Expressed Emotion and Schizophrenia 395
- The Therapeutic Process 396
- Medical Family Therapy 398
 - Leading Figures 398
 - Collaborative Family Healthcare Association 399
 - Family Therapist–Physician Partnerships 400
 - Family Therapist–Family Partnerships 401
- Gay and Lesbian Families 402
- Psychoeducation: Teaching Skills to Specific Populations 403
- Relationship Education Programs 404
 - Relationship Enhancement 405
 - PREPARE/ENRICH 407
 - The Prevention and Relationship Enhancement Program (PREP) 408
 - Other Couple and Marriage Programs 409

Family Violence	410
Divorce and Remarriage	410
Divorce	410
Stepfamily Programs	411
Summary	414
Recommended Readings	415

PART V CLINICAL RESEARCH: THE SYNERGY OF SCIENCE AND PRACTICE 416

16 Evidence-Based Family Therapy 416

Qualitative and Quantitative Research Methodologies	418
Couple and Family Assessment Research	421
Self-Report Measures	422
The Circumplex Model	422
Family Environment Scale	424
Observational Methods	426
The McMaster Model of Family Functioning	427
The Beavers Systems Model	428
Dyadic Assessment	433
Individual Assessment in Couple and Family Therapy	433
Family Therapy Process and Outcome Research	433
Process Research	435
Outcome Research	437
Evidence-Based Family Therapy: Some Closing Comments	440
Summary	442
Recommended Readings	442

PART VI FAMILY THEORIES AND FAMILY THERAPIES: A COMPARATIVE ASSESSMENT 443

17 Comparative View of Family Theories and Therapies 443

Family Theories: A Comparative Overview	444
Units of Study: Monads, Dyads, and Triads	444
Time Frame: Past, Present, Future	445
Functional and Dysfunctional Families	447
Family Therapies: A Comparative Overview	451
The Role of the Therapist	451
Assessment Procedures	452
Insight and Action Modes	454

Key Methods of Intervention	455
Crisis, Brief, and Long-Term Family Therapy	457
Goals of Treatment	458
A Final Word on Theoretical Integration	459
Psychopharmacology and Family Therapy	464
Summary	466
Recommended Readings	466
Glossary	467
References	477
Name Index	516
Subject Index	524

List of Boxes

CASE STUDIES

Box 1.2	A Traumatized Family Rebounds from a Sudden Crisis	8
Box 1.6	A Couple in Conflict Seek Help over Money Issues	17
Box 2.4	A Religious Couple Divides into Two Single-Parent Households	50
Box 2.5	A Lesbian Couple Adopts a Child	55
Box 3.4	Counseling a Latino Family	68
Box 3.8	A Couple Confronts Domestic Violence	77
Box 4.5	An Immigrant Family Faces an Intergenerational Conflict	98
Box 4.6	Using an Ecomap in Family Assessment and Therapy	102
Box 6.3	A Therapist Reports Parental Abuse	149
Box 7.5	Object Relations Therapy with a Distressed Couple	177
Box 8.5	Ghosts from the Holocaust	210
Box 8.7	A Farming Couple Faces a Dilemma	213
Box 8.11	Taking a Relationship into Account	220
Box 8.12	A Contextual Therapist Elicits a Family's Relational Resources	222
Box 10.3	Structural Therapy with a Divided Stepfamily	278
Box 11.1	Treating an Alcoholic Symptom	289

CLINICAL NOTES

Box 1.7	Contrasting Linear and Circular Causality	22
Box 2.6	Heterosexual Therapists Working with Gay and Lesbian Couples	58
Box 3.2	Recognizing Strengths in African-American Families	63
Box 3.3	Cultural Sharing	65
Box 3.6	Transition into Parenthood	75
Box 3.9	Example of Gender-Sensitive Family Therapy Techniques	79
Box 4.2	Family Rules and Family Dysfunction	90
Box 4.4	Negative and Positive Feedback Loops	94
Box 5.2	Social Workers and Family Therapy	117
Box 5.3	Motivation in Couples Therapy	118
Box 6.2	Avoiding Malpractice	143
Box 6.4	Computer Technology and Confidentiality	150
Box 6.5	Limits of Confidentiality	151

Box 6.6	Termination of Therapy	154
Box 7.1	Eclecticism and Integration in Current Family Practice	158
Box 7.2	Learning to Use a Specific Model	159
Box 8.1	A Feminist Challenge	195
Box 8.6	Constructing a Genogram in Family Therapy	212
Box 8.8	Using “I-statements” in Family Therapy	215
Box 8.10	Treatment Technique: Have Partners Speak to the Therapist	217
Box 9.1	Symbolic-Experiential Therapy’s Distinguishing Features	227
Box 9.5	A Gestalt Family Therapy Credo	238
Box 9.6	Satir’s Eight Aspects of the Self	242
Box 9.8	Outlining the EFCT Change Process	250
Box 9.9	Attachment Injuries May Result in Rage	251
Box 9.10	Steps in the EFT Treatment Manual	252
Box 11.9	A Humanistic Set of Strategies?	312
Box 12.1	Ten Underlying Assumptions of Behavioral Therapy	316
Box 12.2	Some Common Cognitive Distortions Among Couples	320
Box 12.3	Some Characteristics of Behavioral Family Therapies	321
Box 12.4	Homework Assignments as Therapeutic Aids	325
Box 12.5	Parental Disagreement About Child Treatment	329
Box 12.9	Individual or Conjoint Sexual Status Examinations	340
Box 13.2	Some Characteristics of Social Constructionist Therapies	350
Box 14.1	A Dominant Story: “I’m a Good Student”	372
Box 14.3	Practicing Externalizing	379
Box 14.6	Clients Keep Significant Communications	384
Box 15.2	Psychoeducational Guidelines for Families and Friends of Schizophrenics	397
Box 15.3	Common Family Adaptations to Chronic Illness	399
Box 15.4	Psychosocial Types of Illness	400
Box 15.5	Strategies for Medical Family Therapy	401
Box 15.7	Underlying Factors in Premarital Counseling	405
Box 15.8	Paying Attention to the Referral Source	407
Box 15.9	Preparation for Marriage	408

EVIDENCE-BASED PRACTICE

Box 1.4	Dual Work Families	11
Box 3.1	Therapists’ Background Influences Assessment and Treatment	62
Box 3.5	Changing Educational, Work, and Family Roles	74
Box 4.1	How Digital Media and Social Networking Are Affecting Families	88
Box 5.1	How Disturbed Families Deal with Emotions	115
Box 5.5	Core Competencies in Practicing Family Therapy	133
Box 6.1	The Movement toward Evidence-Based Practice	142
Box 13.7	Support for SFBT	359

Box 15.1	Families With Mental Disorders	396
Box 15.10	Children of Divorce	411
Box 16.1	Quantitative–Qualitative Collaboration in Family Research	420
Box 16.5	Efficacy Studies Versus Effectiveness Studies	439
Box 16.6	Assumptions Underlying Evidence-Based Therapy Research	440

FAMILY DIVERSITY

Box 1.3	Therapy for ethnic minority families following disasters	9
Box 2.1	Family diversity may modify life cycle stages	31
Box 2.2	Migration and the Life Cycle	39
Box 8.3	Bowen and diversity	205
Box 8.9	Coaching for Family Reentry	216
Box 10.1	Structural Family Therapy with Diverse Families	257
Box 12.7	Conducting a Sexual Status Examination	338
Box 13.10	Using SFBT across cultures	367
Box 14.2	Culture and cultural meaning in narrative therapy	377

THINKING LIKE A CLINICIAN

Box 1.1	Appreciating Family Narratives	6
Box 1.5	Assessing One's Own Possible Biases	15
Box 2.3	Attachment Injuries May Result in Rage	46
Box 3.7	Challenging Stereotypes	76
Box 4.3	Family Rules	91
Box 4.7	Systemic Thinking Habits	103
Box 5.6	Developing Core Competencies	134
Box 6.7	Ethical and Professional Dilemmas	155
Box 7.6	Family Therapy and Object Relations	179
Box 8.4	Detriangulation and Differentiation	208
Box 9.3	S-EFT	235
Box 10.2	Assessing a Family	269
Box 10.4	Monitoring Dysfunctional Sets	281
Box 11.2	Relabeling	291
Box 11.4	Strategic Family Therapy	295
Box 11.5	Symptoms: Voluntary or Involuntary Efforts at Control?	298
Box 11.6	Even-Handed Alliances	299
Box 11.8	Exploring Interpersonal Patterns	310
Box 12.6	Negotiating a Contingency Contract	334
Box 13.6	Using an SFBT Perspective in Family Therapy	358
Box 13.9	Using a Linguistic Perspective in Family Therapy	365
Box 14.5	Unique Outcomes	382

Box 14.7	Narrative Therapy	385
Box 14.8	Recent Research	387
Box 15.6	Working With a Person With HIV	403
Box 15.9	Preparation for Marriage	408
Box 15.11	Negotiations Within a New Stepfamily	413
Box 16.3	Using Observational Methods for Assessing Family Functioning	429
Box 17.1	Formulating Your Own Theoretical Orientation	465

THERAPEUTIC ENCOUNTER

Box 5.4	Advancing a New Epistemology	130
Box 7.3	Ackerman's Active, Challenging Interventions: A Clinical Vignette	168
Box 7.4	The Cinderella Story: A Case of Splitting?	172
Box 7.7	Cinderella Revisited: A Case of a Self Disorder?	182
Box 8.2	Bowen's Self-Differentiation from His Family of Origin	203
Box 9.2	Working with Symbolic-Experiential Family Therapy	232
Box 9.4	Whitaker: The Person of the Therapist	236
Box 9.7	Satir Clarifies Family Communication	246
Box 11.3	Strategically Designing a Novel Solution for a Chronic Problem	294
Box 11.7	An Anorectic Adolescent and the Family Game	308
Box 12.8	Conducting a Sexual Status Examination	339
Box 13.1	Constructivism and Social Constructionism	348
Box 13.3	A Therapist Initiates a Solution Process	352
Box 13.4	Either/Or or Both/And Choices	353
Box 13.5	Asking the Miracle Question	355
Box 13.8	Hermeneutics and Collaborative Therapy	364
Box 14.4	Overcoming Dominant Problem-Saturated Stories	380
Box 16.2	Home-Based Services	427
Box 16.4	What Within-Session Mechanisms Stimulate Change?	436

Foreword by Michael White

*Michael White had a special place in our hearts, both personally and professionally.
He is sorely missed.*

Irene Goldenberg

The publication of this text represents an achievement of extraordinary scope in which Irene and Herbert Goldenberg bring together more than five decades of developments in the ideas and practices of family therapy. Extraordinary scope, because in doing this these authors have not been content to incorporate just the principal developments in this field. In the space of this one text, Irene and Herbert Goldenberg also trace many of the tributaries that have branched out of those developments in ideas and practice that have been accorded mainstream status in the field of family therapy.

Before reading this text, I had made some assumptions about it. To cover the history of developments in a field like family therapy, one in which there has been little orthodoxy and great diversity, would surely require considerable economy of writing. Overview, a word from the book's title, seemed to my mind to imply a very limited perspective. I was expecting the sort of academic writing that would provide a reasoned gloss of developments through the history of family therapy. I had forecast the sort of dry account of these developments that is intended to provide the reader with a passing knowledge of this broad subject matter. I had assumed that the authors of such a text would have little option but to rein in their ambitions for the reader's engagement with this material and to keep modest their hopes for the reader's experience of its reading—perhaps simply to hope to kindle the reader's interest in specific ideas that might be pursued through consulting more dedicated sources.

Not so! Upon reading this book I discovered that Herbert and Irene Goldenberg had not been content to offer their readers a summary account of developments that simply conveys a passing knowledge of this material. Despite the limitations associated with an economy in writing imposed by the circumstances, these authors have produced a highly engaging text that introduces the reader to the profundity of the principal ideas and practices of family therapy, while at the same time rendering the complexities associated with these ideas and practices readily available to the comprehension of the reader. Rather than acquainting the reader with a passing knowledge, this text takes him or her to a vantage point that allows a vital, close-up view of the terrain.

How is this achieved? This text does not constitute the expected “armchair exposition.” Instead, it is alive with the adventures initiated and the journeys traveled through the history of family therapy. The reader gains a strong sense of the authors’ significant personal experiences of these adventures and journeys, of their intimate familiarity with many expeditions into new territories of ideas and practices. In the reading of this text, one is left with no doubt that Herbert and Irene Goldenberg have been at the scene, actively joining with others over many years in explorations of new forms of human inquiry. In this recounting, these authors succeed in evoking the original spirit of these developments in human inquiry and the inspiration that was an outcome of numerous efforts to think beyond what has been routinely thought about people’s lives and their relationships. These authors also succeed in conveying to the reader the excitement of these adventures and journeys—the sense of actually undertaking these expeditions.

The authors also engage readers vitally through user-friendly writing devices that provide a scaffold for comprehension of the text. The text is organized with functional headings and subheadings, with topics divided into six parts: “Fundamentals of Family Psychology,” “The Development and Practice of Family Therapy,” “The Established Schools of Family Therapy,” “New Directions in Family Therapy,” “Clinical Research: The Synergy of Science and Practice,” and “Family Theories and Family Therapies: An Overview.” Each chapter is thoughtfully structured and replete with helpful and concise summaries and recommended readings. The judicious use of tables, illustrations, and quotes contributes to this easy-to-use composition. Particularly important is the even-handed and respectful way in which Irene and Herbert Goldenberg present the various developments in the history of family therapy and the available critiques of these developments. This fair-mindedness encourages the reader’s fuller involvement with the text—it recruits the reader’s contemplation and rouses his or her fascination.

I believe there is something for everybody to be found in this book. For those new to the field of family therapy, this book provides a gripping account of the history of developments in the family therapy field, of the continuities and discontinuities in these developments, and of many context- and era-specific influences that have contributed to the shape of these developments. For other readers, this book offers a ready reference to, and will instigate further explorations of, those developments that have most captured their imaginations and exercised their minds. For yet other readers, this text provides a source of renewed reflection on the history of their own family therapy practice and will encourage a richer appreciation of the traditions of thought that have shaped their work. And, of course, this text gives many readers an opportunity to become more fully acquainted with traditions in thought and practice that they might not otherwise be familiar with.

Apart from these comments about what is in store for you as you open the pages of this book, I will include here a few comments about the authors. Although there is much that can be said about their own contributions to the family therapy field over a considerable period of its development, my desire here is to say something about the personae of Irene and Herbert Goldenberg, for I would like you to get to know them just a little as I have known them.

Although I had been expecting this book to represent a relatively limited summary of the history of developments in the field of family therapy, I was nonetheless not surprised to find these expectations so contradicted in my reading of this text. I had met Herbert and Irene Goldenberg on various occasions over the years, principally in the context of workshops that I have given in the Los Angeles area. I first became aware of their presence in these workshops some years ago. I recall, toward the end of one of these events, being asked some particularly thought-provoking, searching, and persistent questions about some of the ideas and practices I had been discussing. In this workshop context, the questions—coming in particular from two people in the room—provided a foundation for conversations that contributed to significant clarification of certain similarities and distinctions in a range of ideas and practices.

At the end of the workshop, I approached these two figures for personal introductions. Through this and my subsequent contacts with Herbert and Irene Goldenberg, I have come to admire the breadth of their experience, the scope of their knowledge, and their capacity for thoughtfulness. All of these qualities are so evident in this book. But they have contributed much more than this to the family therapy field. I have also come to admire the part that their strong social consciousness and their generosity of spirit play in their personal and professional worlds. Herbert and Irene Goldenberg are always quick to recognize transgressions of the principles of fairness, equality, and justice; and they are never tardy in naming these transgressions. They are also quick to offer support to those who have experienced unfairness, inequality, and injustice. And, in their efforts to challenge these wrongs, Herbert and Irene Goldenberg manage to stay true to their principles of understanding and to their appreciation of difference and diversity. In this way they make it possible for people to find new places in which to stand in the territories of their lives and work. When I am in the presence of Irene and Herbert Goldenberg, I know that I am in good company.

Michael White (1948–2008)
Codirector of Dulwich Centre
Adelaide, South Australia

Preface

With each new edition of Family Therapy: An Overview, we have the opportunity to tell once more the evolving story of the profession. Even in the four years since the eighth edition, the theory and clinical practice of family therapy have changed in important ways that affect everyone involved. Students, researchers, professors, and clinicians all need to know not only the origins and history of family therapy but the very latest in what it means to work as a family therapist. Changes emerge from within the field as well as in response to a wide range of pressures and other influences from society at large. In Family Therapy, ninth edition, we strive to honor our past as well as understand and explain present-day developments.

Our Mission in Writing Family Therapy: An Overview

The purpose of our book is to convey to new and returning readers alike the excitement of the field as it develops over time. We hope to impart to readers an attitude of theoretical and clinical openness that appreciates past, present, and future developments. We feel it is important to constantly challenge our own biases whether in working with clients or in considering different theoretical approaches to our work. Indeed, the ninth edition goes further than previous editions in considering the clinical value of integrating theories both in terms of expanding personal boundaries and in better appreciating how the diversity of our client population reminds us that no one approach to practice can tell us the whole story about how best to work. Postmodernism reminds us again and again that there is no final truth about our theories and practices. As clinicians, we must continually challenge ourselves to accept and celebrate this revelation. We can never know it all, but we can keep learning. Family Therapy, ninth edition, is designed to help support this lifelong commitment to personal and professional growth. Indeed, our commitment to revising the book reflects our own ongoing commitment to remaining open to challenging our own biases and remaining open to change.

The Tradition and Present-Day Developments

Family therapy, with its revolutionary emphasis on systems thinking and the search for identifiable and recurrent family patterns, first emerged in the mid-1950s. By the 1970s, having been inspired by such trailblazers as Virginia Satir, Salvador Minuchin, Jay Haley, and Carl Whitaker, many who were accustomed to working with individuals had “caught the bug”—become convinced of the therapeutic power of understanding individual behavior in the context of the family system. The more we learned, the more we came to grasp the influence of larger systems—race, social class, gender, ethnicity, sexual orientation—on the functioning of the family and its individual members. Postmodern thinking introduced us to the further importance of language and belief systems in understanding how people construct their views of reality.

The initial edition of this book attempted to provide a comprehensive textbook offering an overview of the field—not merely a biased description of any one of the specific models then vying for the clinician’s attention—based on the assumption that an even-handed account could prove a useful guide to others interested in entering the field of family therapy. As stated in the first edition, published in 1980, the goal was to offer readers a balanced presentation of the major theoretical underpinnings and clinical practices in the field. We promised not only to provide an overview of the evolving viewpoints, perspectives, values, intervention techniques, and goals of family therapy but also to attempt to keep pace with the field’s clinical and research developments. That promise continues to be the goal in this latest edition.

What’s New in the Ninth Edition?

We have introduced new features to the text in this edition to reflect important issues in family therapy and advances in the field. These features include:

- Highlighted material on key themes of family therapy. Framed boxes in select colors with an icon designating special themes throughout the text:
 -  Family Diversity. We have added boxes to highlight individual and group diversity perspectives, issues, and research relevant to the chapter content throughout the book so that students are challenged to think about how the material relates to diverse populations.
 -  Thinking Like a Clinician. Many new and revised boxes present clinical challenges and opportunities for the reader to respond to and learn from. Readers are asked to address clinical situations—many taken from real-life therapy situations—from different theoretical perspectives. These boxes are intended to heighten self-exploration regarding individual thoughts, feelings, and experiences relative to the different models presented.
 -  Evidence-Based Practice boxes. Recent research relevant to the chapter content and the practice of family therapy is featured in these boxes.
 -  Case Study. Examples of therapy cases that illustrate the material in that chapter, these boxes help students apply the concepts to family therapy.
 -  Clinical Note. These boxes feature succinct information or suggestions about using the chapter ideas in family therapy.
 -  Therapeutic Encounter. Clinical vignettes and dialogue are featured in these boxes to provide insight into the way in which ideas manifest in the words of the clients and the therapist.
- Inclusion of professions that practice family therapy. Examples and material throughout the text illustrate that family therapists come from many professions, including social work (CSWE), MFT (AAMFT), psychology (APA), and counseling (CACREP).

- Updated references and cited material. Every chapter in this edition includes up-to-date references and presents the latest thinking about its issues. Materials from sources (for example, family therapy models or figures and model depictions, as well as direct quotations) have been updated to the latest published versions.
- Learning Objectives. Each chapter begins with select student learning objectives that align with the content of the chapter. Content specific to each objective is identified throughout the text.
- Increased attention to LGBTQ families. More attention is given to LGBTQ issues throughout the book, including chapter content and the student exercises. Several of the Thinking Like a Clinician boxes raise real-life issues faced by LGBTQ families.
- More concise content. We carefully edited the entire volume to provide valuable information aligned to the reading assignments of contemporary classes.
- New Recommended Readings. Many chapters feature new or updated texts in the recommended readings section at the end of each chapter. These may help faculty and students reference source materials for themes in the chapter.

In addition to the general changes just outlined, we have made many chapter-specific changes that reflect today's knowledge and clinical practice. The following are included among the important more specific changes:

- Chapter 1: Enhanced coverage of social and cultural diversity in family therapy with new material on family forms and diversity perspectives, including a new Family Diversity box focused on how family therapists may assist minority families experiencing natural disasters.
- Chapter 2: An increased focus on family life cycle development, including expanded coverage of dynamics related to divorce, single-parent families, remarried families, and families with gay or lesbian members. A new figure depicting recent demographics of one-parent families demonstrates key aspects of these families.
- Chapter 3: Now titled “Diversity in Family Functioning,” this chapter provides a foundation for developing a multicultural framework and sequences from culture and ethnicity to gender issues to socioeconomic diversity and social justice perspectives in family therapy. Recent research, demographics, and theoretical-clinical applications are provided.
- Chapter 4: Now titled “Systems Theory and Systemic Thinking,” this chapter presents systemic thinking as a paradigm shift from typical Western thought. It presents a new figure to convey a systemic perspective and recent examples of systemic concepts in the practice of family therapy. The section on critiques of systems theory has been revised to reflect recent developments. There are new insets on social media and the family and systemic thinking.
- Chapter 5: We clearly delineate the progress of family therapy across decades. New material regarding core competencies for family therapy, including standards created by different professional organizations, is provided in this edition.

- Chapter 6: We explicitly include the legal and ethical perspectives on family therapy by different professional organizations, referencing the ethics codes of those organizations. A new table that compares the ethics codes of four organizations is provided. We reference recent advances in professional practice, including the Affordable Care Act. Information on the practice of and ethical problems associated with “e-therapy” is also included.
- Chapter 8: We added material on the assessment and measurement of differentiation in Bowen theory, as well as research about the use of Bowen constructs with diverse populations.
- Chapter 9: There is new material about research on therapist practices and the client’s experience of emotion in symbolic-experiential family therapy. Material is added on steps in the change process in emotionally focused therapy and recent research that demonstrates evidence for the effectiveness of the approach.
- Chapter 10: Material addressing research evidence for the structural model, particularly with diverse populations, is added.
- Chapter 11: Information on brief strategic family therapy and the substantial evidence for its effectiveness is added.
- Chapter 12: Clarifies the relationship of behavioral and cognitive-behavioral approaches to couple and family therapy. There is a new section on the Gottman method, including an outline of his research-based predictors of divorce and overview of the Sound Relationship House model, with diagram. There is a new summary of recent research regarding behavioral couple and family therapy. Finally, there is substantial new material on functional family therapy and sex therapy, as well as diversity aspects of all the models.
- Chapter 13: Recent advances in each model are described. New material on the evidence for solution-focused brief therapy and the use of the approaches with diverse populations is presented.
- Chapter 14: A recent model of the life narrative, including a figure, is presented. We also clarify ideas like “the absent but implicit” and “externalizing” in Michael White’s thinking and the way techniques like letter writing may adapt with new technology. There is new material about the way narrative functions in diverse populations and the creative use of postpositivist thinking and methods to demonstrate the clinical effectiveness of narrative therapy.
- Chapter 15: This chapter is now titled “Population-Based Family Treatments” to capture the variety of client populations served by family therapy. It has significant new material about families and schools; individual mental disorders in the family context (depression, anxiety, substance abuse, eating disorders, schizophrenia); primary medical care and the family; gay and lesbian families; relationship education (including updates on Prepare-Enrich and PREP); family violence; and divorce and stepparenting; all feature recent research and clinical applications.
- Chapter 16: This chapter is now titled “Evidence-Based Family Therapy” to recognize the importance of connecting research and practice in contemporary family therapy. We present the value of both qualitative and quantitative methods in family therapy research, as well as ways postmodern therapies can demonstrate evidence for effectiveness. There is new material on assessment, including sections on couple assessment and individual assessment in family therapy, and new content on process research, including intersession client input techniques. The findings of three major family therapy review studies are included in the outcome research section, and a new table depicts the evidence for family therapy with particular issues.

- Chapter 17: New material is provided on common factors and the role they play in interaction with model-specific change factors in effective family therapy. We clarify the difference between eclecticism without theoretical unification and integration based on some unifying rationale, noting challenges to theoretical integration, yet highlighting recent approaches that advocate for or attempt integration in a coherent fashion. A student exercise in formulation of a personal theoretical orientation has been enhanced for this edition.

Ancillaries

Cengage Learning is committed to providing the most effective and up-to-date ancillaries our audience requires. As with past editions, Family Therapy: An Overview is supported with teaching and learning supplements to enhance the course experience. These are outlined below.

MindTap® Counseling MindTap® for Goldenberg/Stanton/Goldenberg's Family Therapy: An Overview, 9th Edition is the digital learning solution that helps instructors engage and transform today's students into critical thinkers and provides students with the tools needed to better manage their limited time, with the ability to complete assignments whenever and wherever they are ready to learn.

Cengage Learning Testing Powered by Cognero® Cengage Learning Testing Powered by Cognero® is a flexible, online system that allows you to: import, edit, and manipulate content from the text's test bank or elsewhere, including your own favorite test questions; create multiple test versions in an instant; and deliver tests from your LMS, your classroom, or wherever you want.

Acknowledgments

This is to acknowledge my new co-author, Mark Stanton. Without his superb up to the minute knowledge, his extraordinary editing skills and his general overall knowledge of the field, I could never have accomplished the completion of this book. He has the best work habits of any academic that I have worked with over my many years.

Thank you Mark!

Irene Goldenberg

We would like to express our appreciation to Michael Lee, Doctor of Psychology student at Azusa Pacific University, for his outstanding work as a research assistant on this edition. Mark Stanton is grateful for the support he received from his wife, Kathy, and his children, April, Erin, Chelse, and Sean.

In every edition of Family Therapy: An Overview, we pay keen attention to the needs of instructors and their students in preparing our new manuscript. The ninth edition is no exception. We wish to thank the following reviewers for their insights as the new edition was evolving. Their comments and suggestions for change were invaluable resources in the preparation of the ninth edition:

Rebecca Koltz – Montana State University
Catherine Weigel Foy – Northwestern University
Cindy Silitsky – St. Thomas University
Victoria Fitton – Michigan State University
Gary Bischof – Western Michigan University

Irene Goldenberg and Mark Stanton

1

Adopting a Family Relationship Framework

A family is far more than a collection of individuals sharing a specific physical and psychological space. While families occur in a diversity of forms, cultures, and complexities in today's rapidly changing society, each may be considered a natural, sustained social system¹ with properties:

- an evolved set of rules
- many assigned and ascribed roles for its members
- an organized power structure
- intricate overt and covert forms of communication
- numerous ways of negotiating and problem solving that permit various tasks to be performed effectively

The relationships among members of this microculture are deep and multilayered, and they are based largely on a shared history, internalized perceptions, and assumptions about the world, and a sense of purpose. Within such a system, individuals are tied to one another by powerful, durable, reciprocal, multigenerational emotional attachments and loyalties that may fluctuate in intensity and psychological distance between members over time yet persist over the lifetime of the family.

Each family system is itself embedded in a community and society at large. It is molded by its existence at a particular place and time in history and shaped further by a multitude of interlocking phenomena, such as race, ethnicity, socioeconomic status, family life cycle stage, number of generations in this country, immigration status, sexual ¹Terms in boldface are defined in the Glossary at the back of the book.

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

- LO 1 Describe the diversity of contemporary families
- LO 2 Explain the importance of family structure and interactive patterns
- LO 3 Justify a resiliency-based understanding of family dynamics
- LO 4 Explain how gender, race, and ethnicity influence families and family therapy
- LO 5 Discuss the evolution of family therapy from cybernetics to constructivism orientation, religious affiliation, the physical and mental health of its members, level of educational attainment, and family values and belief systems.

All these factors and many others influence the system's development, beliefs, standards for acceptable behavior, degree of flexibility in meeting both normal developmental challenges and unanticipated crises, and in general its adaptability and stability over time.

Before turning to these influences, we shall examine several basic ideas that characterize most family systems.

Family Systems: Fundamental Concepts

All families create and socialize new members, and although most ultimately give these members autonomy and do not expect them to live under the same roof into adulthood, family membership remains intact for life. The power of the family is such that despite the possible separation of members by vast distances, sometimes even by death, the family's influence remains (Kaye, 1985). Even when a family member experiences a temporary or permanent sense of alienation from the family, he or she can never truly relinquish family membership. Should divorce occur, co-parenting may continue, and the former marriage continues to be recognized with the designation of “ex-spouse” (McGoldrick & Shibusawa, 2012). For most of us, relationships with siblings are likely to represent our longest continuous commitments (Cicirelli, 1995).

As McGoldrick, Carter, and Garcia-Preto (2010) point out, families are subject to unique constraints. A business organization may fire an employee viewed as dysfunctional, or an employee may resign if the structure or values of the company are not to their liking. The pressures of family membership allow few such exits, even for those who move a great geographic distance from their family of origin. Further, unlike members of nonfamily systems, who can generally be replaced if they leave, family members are irreplaceable. Should a parent leave or die, for example, and another person be brought in to fill a parenting role, the substitute, regardless of successful effort, can never replace in the same way the lost parent's personal and emotional ties to the remaining members.

Growth and change in families and the individual members who compose them occur concurrently, and understanding their interactions is essential in carrying out any reparative or preventive work (Nichols & Pace-Nichols, 2000). In the process of growing up, family members develop individual identities but nevertheless remain attached to the family group, which in turn maintains an evolving identity or collective image of its own. These family members do not live in isolation but rather are dependent on one another—not merely for money, food, clothing, and shelter but also for love, affection, mutual commitment, companionship, socialization, the expectation of long-lasting relationships, and fulfillment of other intangible needs. They maintain a history by telling and retelling their family “story” from one generation to the next, thus ensuring a sense of family continuity and shaping the expectations of members regarding the future. To function successfully, members need to adapt to the changing needs and demands of fellow family members as well as the changing expectations of the larger kinship network, the community, and society in general (DeGenova, Stinnett, & Stinnett, 2011).

Apart from its survival as a system, a well-functioning family encourages the realization of the individual potential of its members—allowing them freedom for exploration and self-discovery along with protection and the instillation of a sense of security.

Constantine (1986) distinguishes between what he calls “enabled” and “disabled” family systems. The former succeeds at balancing system needs as a family unit while simultaneously facilitating the interests of all its members as individuals. Enabled families invent procedures that attempt to satisfy the conflicting interests of their members. Constantine maintains that to do less, or to prevail at the expense of certain members, reflects family disablement, often manifested in unstable, rigid, or chaotic family patterns.

Some families, unfortunately, are so depleted as a result of external or internal stress (poverty, migration to a country where they lack language skills or understanding of unfamiliar customs, serious health problems, legal issues, unforeseen accidents) that they may need community support. Low-income families receiving social assistance and working-poor families in particular may increase their chances for success and self-sufficiency when they receive such social support. Pigott and Monaco (2004), Canadian community workers in a multiservice center in Toronto, describe the debilitating effects of poverty and living in inadequate housing in unsafe neighborhoods. Often led by a lone parent or parents who are unavailable or working for long periods, with few siblings and limited contact with grandparents, such families feel isolated and defeated. They need social networks (healthcare facilities, after-school programs, recreation centers, libraries, community agencies). Being a part of such a social system often represents a step toward reducing isolation and increasing the possibilities of more effective self-care and improved quality of life.

LO 1 Today's Families: A Pluralistic View

Traditionally, entrance into a family system has been seen to occur only through birth, adoption, or marriage. Today's outlook, however, makes room for other committed family households beyond legally married heterosexual couples and their children (McGoldrick & Carter, 2010). There are further divisions and complexities within each type of family structure, brought about by early or later marriages, interracial coupling, foster parenting, informal kinship adoptions, social class position, and so forth. In general, an inclusive 21st-century definition of family must go beyond traditional thinking to include people who choose to spend their lives together in a kinship relationship despite the lack of legal sanctions or bloodlines.

It no longer is realistic to speak of a typical American family, since contemporary life is filled with families with differing living arrangements, styles of living, and organizational patterns. As Goldenberg and Goldenberg (2002) observe:

The idealized, nostalgic portrait of the American nuclear family depicts a carefree, white family with a suburban residence, sole-provider father in a 9–5 job, and a full-time, stay-at-home mother always available when the children return from school. Both parents are dedicated to child-rearing and remain together for life; children are educated in a neighborhood school and attend church with their parents on Sunday; plenty of money and supportive grandparents are available. (p. 10)

Not only is such a depiction of intact (middle-class) family life alien to the vast majority of people today, but there is doubt about whether it ever existed (Coontz, 1992). Although divorce was less common in the past, families were often disrupted by the early death of a parent or by abandonment by a breadwinner. Changes such as remarriage, child placement with relatives, foster care, and orphanages often followed. So, despite the idealized picture of family life, the risk of not growing up in an intact family has been a part of American life for some time (Walsh, 2012b).

Marriage and intact family life, as Coontz (2005) observes, may be viewed as a social invention that in its earliest form emerged from the division of labor between men and women in early societies and served to ensure family survival and efficiency, as men and women were assigned different but collaborative, complementary roles. Today's occupational opportunities, the evolution of women's rights, a more flexible commitment to marriage as a permanent union, and the expectation of greater love and intimacy in marriage have changed expectations regarding marriage. What has broadened our view of family life is the visible impact of working mothers, single-parent households, dual-earner families, long-term unmarried cohabiting couples, never-married couples with children, stepfamilies, adoptive families, and same-sex couples living together with or without children. Even our very sense of kinship itself has become more fluid over the recent past, as suggested by high divorce and remarriage rates (Diderich, 2008).

Just as our view of how families are formed has changed, so too has our understanding of the structure of family life. We turn now to the structural aspects of the family.

LO 2 Family Structure

Families typically develop certain basic structural characteristics and interactive patterns that they utilize to respond to internal and external stresses. These are founded on shared assumptions and family narratives and determine the manner in which families adapt and cope with life changes and challenges.

Basic Structural Characteristics

Whether traditional or innovative, adaptive or maladaptive, efficiently or chaotically organized, married or committed life partners with or without children, a family inevitably attempts, with varying degrees of success, to arrange itself into as functional or enabling a group as possible so that it can meet its shared needs and goals without consistently or systematically preventing particular members from meeting their individual needs and goals (Kantor & Lehr, 1975). To facilitate the cohesive process, a family typically develops rules that outline and allocate the roles and functions of its members. Those who live together for any length of time develop repeatable, preferred patterns for negotiating and arranging their lives.

Even in a family crisis situation or where there is severe conflict between members, families are typically resistant to change and often engage in corrective maneuvers to reestablish familiar interactive patterns. Regardless of format (e.g., nuclear family or stepfamily) or ultimate success, all families should work at promoting positive relationships among members, attend to the personal needs of their constituents, and prepare to cope with developmental or maturational changes (such as children leaving home) as well as unplanned or unexpected crises (job dislocation or loss, divorce, death of a key member, a sudden acute illness). Sometimes, families will reorganize to develop their own special styles in order to adjust to the challenges of life.

Family Interactive Patterns

Families typically display stable, collaborative, purposeful, and recurring patterns of interactive sequences. These largely go unnoticed by outsiders, frequently are unstated, and are not always understood by the participants themselves. Nonverbal exchange patterns among family members, in particular, represent subtle, coded transactions that transmit family rules and functions governing the range of acceptable behaviors tolerated by the family (for instance, that a son does not speak before his father speaks, and he himself can take his turn only after his wife has spoken). Such patterned interactions are jointly engaged-in, highly predictable transactional patterns generated by all family members on cue, as though each participant feels compelled to play a well-rehearsed part, like it or not.

Minuchin, Lee, and Simon (1996) illustrate this point with the following easily recognizable examples:

The complementary construction of family members requires long periods of negotiating, compromising, rearranging, and competing. These transactions are usually invisible, not only because context and subject constantly change but also because they are generally the essence of minutiae. Who passes the sugar? Who checks the map for directions, chooses the movie, changes the channel? Who responds to whom, when, and in what manner? This is the cement by which families solidify their relationships. (p. 30)

Shared family rituals—holiday celebrations, christenings, confirmations, bar and bat mitzvahs, graduations, weddings, funerals, wakes—are part of ongoing family interaction patterns that help ensure family identity and continuity. Rituals are symbolic actions that help families adapt to change rather than struggle against it at the same time that they reaffirm their group unity in dealing with a life transition. They anchor family members to the past, providing a sense of family history and rootedness, while at the same time implying future family interactions. Participating in rituals links the members not only to the family system but also to the wider community and culture (Imber-Black, 2010).

Family Narratives and Assumptions

A family is a maker of meaning (Constantine, 1986), and our individual judgment about what constitutes reality is a function of the beliefs and stories that the family (as well as the culture) imparts about their experiences (Becvar, 2000). Throughout the course of its development, a family fashions and helps instill fundamental and enduring assumptions about the world in which it lives. As a result, the meanings and understandings we attribute to events and situations we encounter are embedded in our family's social, cultural, and historical experiences (Anderson, Burney, & Levin, 1999). Box 1.1: Thinking Like a Clinician is designed to help you appreciate how therapists might begin to appreciate the importance of family narratives.

The narratives or stories a family recounts help explain or justify their structure and interactive patterns. Despite any differences or disagreements between members, the core of family

BOX 1.1 THINKING LIKE A CLINICIAN

Appreciating Family Narratives

Alert therapists pay attention to the unfolding narratives of the families with whom they work. To gain experience in listening to narrative developments, respond to the following prompts as you consider the narrative of your own family.

What family mementos or stories connect your family to a previous generation?
How does your family express its problems or limitations (by anger, attacking the outside world, withdrawing from the outside world, etc.)?
What roles do you find the family has assigned to individual members (such as “brother is the smart one,” “sister is the athlete,” or “father is the depressed one,” etc.)? Can you discuss your role?
Have any losses (of a home, job, family members through death, etc.) affected the way your family values itself?
Does your family strongly identify with an ethnic, racial, or religious heritage?
Has your family retained its socioeconomic position over generations?
Have gender or sexual identity issues been important in your family narrative (gay parents, transgender family member, etc.)? Describe.
What is the role of education in your family?
How important is achievement (monetary, social class, education, athletic, etc.) as a value to your family?
Describe an important family ritual, and explain how it influences the family's appreciation and understanding of itself.

membership is based on acceptance of and belief in a set of abiding suppositions or shared constructs about the family itself and its relationship to its social environment. These constructs are often limited by social class expectations and restraints that influence what members of that class consider to be possible, acceptable, conceivable, or attainable in their lifetimes. Language and dialogue thus play crucial roles in how human beings come to know the world and how they interpret or make sense of their subsequent experiences.

Some families generally view the world as trustworthy, orderly, predictable, masterable; they are likely to view themselves as competent, to encourage individual input by their members, and to feel comfortable, perhaps enjoyably challenged, as a group coping with life. Other families perceive their environment as mostly menacing, unstable, and thus unpredictable and potentially dangerous; in their view, the outside world appears confusing and at times chaotic, so they band together, insist on agreement from all members on all issues, and in that way protect themselves against intrusion and threat. Thus, the narrative a family develops about itself, which is derived largely from its history, passed on from one generation to the next, and influenced by social class expectations, has a powerful impact on its functioning.

The ways in which individuals and their families characteristically deal with their lives are not based on some objective or “true” view of reality but rather on family social constructions—unchallenged views of reality created and perpetuated in conversation with one another, possibly carried on over generations. Such views may act as blinders or restraints—limitations a family places upon itself by its beliefs and values—that prevent its members from noticing other aspects of their lives or seeing other behavioral options. Members of these families typically construct a rationale for why undesirable behavior continues and how they have no alternative but to live their lives in spite of it (Atwood, 1997).

In the postmodern outlook, there is no “true” reality, only the family’s collectively agreed-upon set of constructions, created through language and knowledge that is relational and generatively based, that the family calls reality. As we will illustrate throughout the book, the postmodern view has had a powerful influence on how many family therapists view family life—the social basis for acquiring knowledge—and how these therapists work collaboratively with families to generate new possibilities and co-construct alternative narratives (Gerson, 2010; White, 2007).

LO 3 Family Resiliency

One aspect of the family is its resiliency, that is, its ability to thrive and maintain relatively stable psychological and physical functioning even under adverse conditions. All families face challenges and upheavals during their life cycle from within and without their structure; some are expectable strains (brought on by such potential crises as retirement or divorce or remarriage), while others are sudden and untimely (an unforeseen job loss, the unexpected death of a key family member or family friend, a holdup or rape or other violent and life-threatening experience, an earthquake or flood). However, not all families react to these potentially disturbing and disruptive events in the same way. Some may experience prolonged distress from which they seem never to recover; others suffer less intensely and for shorter periods. For some families, recovery may appear to come quickly, but they later begin to experience unexpected health problems or somehow never again enjoy life the way they once did. Nevertheless, there are large numbers who manage to cope with the temporary upheaval or loss, rebound, and move on to the next challenge. This ability to thrive and maintain relatively stable psychological and physical functioning after extremely aversive experiences, often showing only minor, transient disruption, reveals a great deal about a family’s resilience (Bonanno, 2004). Box 1.2 presents such a case.

Few if any families can expect to avoid exposure to stress, loss, or potentially traumatic events at some points in their life cycle. At the same time, as illustrated in Box 1.2, families have the potential for growth and repair in response to distress, threat, trauma, or crisis, emerging stronger and more resourceful than before (Walsh, 2012a). A family as a whole, or one or more of its members, may manifest dysfunctional behavior during periods of persistent stress, but family processes may mediate the person’s recovery, allowing the family system to rally, buffer stress, reduce the chances of dysfunction, and support optimal adaptation.

Rather than view resiliency as a rare or special set of qualities a family may or may not possess, Masten (2001) contends that such recuperative skills are common phenomena arising from ordinary adaptive processes successfully mastered by most children in the process of development. She maintains that a relatively small set of global factors support resilience in

BOX 1.2 CASE STUDY

A Traumatized Family Rebounds from a Sudden Crisis

When Hurricane Katrina hit New Orleans in 2005, thousands of lives were disrupted as people lost their homes and possessions, their jobs, and sometimes loved ones who were caught up in the subsequent floods. Paul and Margaret, both in their early 30s and near the beginning of their careers, had come to New Orleans 3 years earlier, he as an architect, she as a real estate broker. When forced to leave their newly purchased home, which had been devastated by the hurricane, they were unable to recover any articles or possessions. With their 1-year-old daughter, Christine, they fled in their car to the West Coast to move in with his parents for an indefinite period as they planned their suddenly disrupted future.

Although their marriage had been a relatively stable one, it now faced several crises simultaneously: addressing questions of how to earn a living, where to live, how to arrange child care, how to resume a social life, and so forth. Living with Paul's parents was difficult, since the house was crowded, his mother was ill, his father was upset by the intrusion of the baby, and Paul and Margaret felt too old to now be living with and be largely supported by his parents. Arguments broke out between family members, and in general the home was filled with tensions between the couples.

Despite the strain on their relationship, Paul and Margaret, each with a history of personal as well as professional achievement, ultimately retained their belief that together they would meet the challenge. After a short period in which both felt downcast and despondent, Paul looked up old high school friends, finally landing a job at a construction company, where his architectural skills made him a desired employee. Margaret, no longer able to afford child care and struggling with the responsibilities of being a full-time mom, began to recognize some of the satisfactions that came with being a stay-at-home mother, something she had not contemplated in the past. With no choice but to make decisions regarding where and how they would live, they reassessed their priorities, recognized how much being together as a family meant to them, and acknowledged that they were young people with resources who would learn to adapt.

Initially confused and despairing, feeling desperate at times during their first months in a new environment, they gradually realized that they needed to reorganize their lives to face the new challenges. The new situation was hardly to their liking, but they had each other, their child, and faith in their relationship. Forming new friendships, retaining a sense of humor, and recasting the crisis they faced as a challenge rather than a defeat all helped. As they moved into their new small apartment, they retained the dream of returning to New Orleans soon, better prepared as a family to deal with future adversity.

children: connection to competent and caring adults in the family and community, cognitive and self-regulating skills, a positive view of oneself, and motivation to be effective in the environment. Moving away from a search for deficits or pathology in families in favor of seeking its strengths and potentials—family resiliencies—is part of the evolving movement of positive psychology (Seligman & Csikszentmihalyi, 2000; Sheldon & King, 2001). Here, researchers and therapists have begun to study the nature of effective functioning and adaptation, paying close attention to human capabilities and adaptive systems in individuals and families.

Walsh (2012a) identifies some key family processes in family resilience: (a) a consistent and positive belief system that provides shared values and assumptions so as to offer guidelines for meaning and future action (e.g., viewing disruptions as milestones on their shared life passages without assigning blame and recasting a crisis as a manageable challenge);

(b) the family's organizational processes (how effectively it organizes its resources) that provide the “shock absorbers” when confronted with stress (e.g., remaining flexible, open to change, connected to each other); and (c) a set of family communication/problem-solving processes that are clear, consistent, and congruent and that establish a climate of mutual trust and open expression among its members (maintaining a shared range of feeling, shared decisions, creative brainstorming). Boyd-Franklin (2010) notes that working with ethnic minority families during trauma requires culturally sensitive interventions (see Box 1.3).

While some families may be (temporarily) shattered by crises, others emerge strengthened and more resourceful. Rather than view a symptomatic family member as a vulnerable victim, thus pathologizing the family, the emerging viewpoint is that while problems may certainly exist within the family, family competencies nevertheless can be harnessed to promote self-corrective changes. Resilience should not be considered a static set of strengths or qualities but as a developmental process unique to each family that enables families to create adaptive responses to stress and, in some cases, to thrive and grow in their response to the stressors (Hawley, 2000). Adopting a resiliency-based approach in working with families calls for identifying and fortifying those key interactional processes that enable families to withstand and rebound from disruptive challenges.

How the family organizes itself, how it retains its cohesion, how openly it communicates and problem solves together to cope with the threat largely forecasts its ability to recover. An affirming belief system aids the process. The support of a network of friends, extended family, clergy, neighbors, employers, and fellow employees and the availability of community

BOX 1.3 FAMILY DIVERSITY

Therapy for ethnic minority families following disasters

Boyd-Franklin (2010) explored how African-American families adapted to Hurricane Katrina in order to inform family therapists as they provide services to ethnic minority families following disasters. Her key points include:

- Disasters require cultural sensitivity and respectful treatment that understands the different perspectives of cultural and racial groups. For example, many African Americans believed that race contributed to slow government response to the tragedy while few Whites endorsed that rationale
- Therapist insensitivity to perceived racism may exacerbate the trauma for African-American families
- Family therapists need to recognize that anger in the face of perceived racism may be a healthy response and facilitate coping
- Disasters that require relocation may fragment kin networks in collectivistic cultures, upsetting the support mechanisms typically used by the families
- Ethnic minority children, adolescents, and the elderly may have special needs in the aftermath of trauma and therapists must pay attention to these concerns
- Spirituality and religion may be especially important to some ethnic minority families in coping with tragedy
- Family systems therapy is appropriate for collectivistic ethnic minority families because it is strengths-based and facilitates resilience
- Family systems approaches recognize the need to assist families as they interface with a variety of agencies and organizations in the aftermath of trauma